As an intelligent man he must be somewhat conversant with the history of the drama, ancient and modern, and it he is even tolerably schooled in human nature he knows that the love of dramatic repesentations amounts almost to a unrepesentations amounts almost to a universal passion. The drams in some shape has an existence even among barbarous people. The principle of imitation is inherent in human nature. Painting, posed to have been coveral with scotley. Among even the South Sea Islanders a rude kind of drama has been discovered, and in China it dates its origin light. Other stars because it will afford the accommodations now much needed by the courts, post office in that city. The extension of the Court Honse and sculpture, and the drama, are supdiscovered, and in China it dates its origin night. Other stars, however have done to remote ages. Explorers have witnessed pantomimic representations among the tribes in Africa, in which preparations for battle, the stealthy advance upon the foe the combat, and the rout and death of their enemies, have been rudely pictured to fierce and sensual imaginations. As for the history of the drama among the Greeks and Romans, it is familiar to every school boy. At Rome they once had a theatre that would hold 80,000 people, and at Ephesus, Syracuse, Miletus and other cities of Greece there are still to be sen ruins of huge ancient theatres. The question for Mr. Talmage to dispose of is as to what is to be done with this passion for the drama which has thus prevailed among all nations. When he talks about the destruction of theatres he certainly does not suppose that the passion for dramatic and scenic representation will be eradicated from human nature. And if the nassion of Allen, as already extended the form of the drama which has the passion for dramatic and scenic representation will be eradicated from human nature. The section of the Ohio law bearing on the case, that is, prescribing the maximum rate per mile, and the penalty for overcharges, is given in the letter. The Baltimore & Ohio Company claim (as we understand) that their leased road, the Central Ohio, was built under a charter granted before the law referred to was enacted, and that they, therefore, as its lessee, are not bound by said law. Upon this assumption the company quoted a remark from Macready to the have been arranging local fares to effect "that no child of his should ever visit the theatre with his consent, or have any association whatever with actors or actresses." He also put this ques-tion to his heavers. "Suppose a company of theatrical characters were going off on a tour for a week, and the manager asked the head of any family in this congregation to allow a son of fourteen or a daughter of sevenmaximum rate under the law.
